Whistleblowing Legislation and Protection of Employees

The year 2015 also saw increased focus on whistleblowing protection, with several cases testing the boundaries of employee protection against retaliation for reporting illegal or unethical activities. These work law cases and materials significantly contributed to the ongoing debate about the balance between protecting whistleblowers and preventing frivolous claims. The legal interpretation of "reasonable belief" in the wrongdoing became a central point of contention in many cases, demanding a careful examination of the employee's motives and the evidence available to support their claims.

Contract Law and the Interpretation of Employment Agreements

Significant cases in 2015 also dealt with the interpretation of employment contracts and the implications for both employers and employees. This includes cases involving restrictive covenants (non-compete agreements), garden leave clauses, and the enforceability of bonus schemes.
