Pictorial Greenhouse Management

The year: circa 30 A.D. The place: Rome. Royal physicians have warned the ailing emperor Tiberius that he must eat a cucumber every day. So begins construction of a specularium, a house dedicated to growing plants. Constantly maintained fires outside the stone walls heat the air inside. A translucent roof crafted from thin sheets of mica allows sunlight indoors. The greenhouse is born! Greenhouse technology has come a long way since the time of the ancient Romans, but the concept an enclosed structure providing a special environment for plants is essentially the same today. Gardeners use these structures to protect plants from heat or cold, to extend a plant's growing season or to foster non-native plants. The Roman emperor's cucumber experiment was referenced some half a millenium later by Thomas Hill, author of the first popular gardening book in English. He gives his readers practical advice on protecting spring seedlings in a coldframe-type structure until the weather is reliably warm: \"The young plants may be defended from cold and boisterous windes, yea, frosts, the cold aire, and hot Sunne, if Glasses made for the onely purpose, be set over them, which on such wise bestowed on the beds, yeelded in a manner to Tiberius Caesar, Cucumbers all the year, in which he took great delight

The Northlands Winter Greenhouse Manual

Are you considering adding a greenhouse to your backyard? That is an idea I wholeheartedly support! We've had our little greenhouse for a while now, and it's become a beloved part of our farm! It allows us to start a lot more produce from seed than we could before because we didn't have enough space indoors. On rainy winter days, it's also become a unique and weirdly personal location to spend time \"outside.\" To be honest, we enjoy and utilize it far more than we imagined! Let me share what we've learned and experienced in using and maintaining a hobby greenhouse while you consider your options.
